Extract from: 'The Hunger Games' Chapter Two

I watch him as he makes his way to the stage. Medium height, stocky build, ashy blond hair that falls in waves on his forehead.

The shock of the moment is registering on his face, you can see his struggle to be emotionless, but his blue eyes show the alarm I've seen in prey.

He has two older brothers, I know, I've seen them in the bakery.

Suddenly a voice was screaming at me and I looked up to see the baker's wife, telling me how sick she was of those brats from the seam pawing through her rubbish.

As I crept away, I noticed him, a boy with blond hair peering out from behind his mother's back.

I thought. Or better yet, let me right here in the rain.

There was a clatter in the bakery and I heard the woman screaming again and the sound of a blow.

It was the boy. In his arms, he carried two large loaves of bread that must have fallen into the fire because the crusts were scorched black.

The boy never glanced my way but I was watching him. Because of the bread, because of the red welt on his cheekbone. What had she hit him with?

The boy took one look back at the bakery as if checking that the coast was clear, then...he threw the loaf of bread in my direction.

It never occurred to me that he might have dropped the loaves into the flames, knowing it meant being punished, and then delivered them to me.
